

I find allegations that Pappas Telecasting Companies is donating airtime to air political views, giving a hand to Republican candidates.

This looks like another interesting example of a corporation serving what it perceives as the short-term interests of its high-level managers instead of serving its listeners, while government regulators are asleep at the wheel and keeps providing it with free use of airwaves.

This comforts my belief that the FCC is a prime candidate for a management shake-up and a stiff budget cut, as soon as the federal government realizes that the budget deficit needs to be brought under control.
